T he pandemic's impact will remain in our collective consciousness for a long time. It has underscored the many aspects of human life and development that need to be addressed, including the renewable energy sector. However, for the renewable energy sector, the pandemic has brought both hope and despair. On one hand, the pandemic has accelerated the transition to renewable energy, driven by the need for a more sustainable and resilient power system. On the other hand, the financial crisis has affected the ability of utilities and governments to invest in renewable energy projects.

According to a recent report by the International Energy Agency (IEA), a sharp drop in demand, accompanied by construction delays, made worse by the poor financial performance of the renewable energy sector (REDS), led to a drop in investment in new renewable energy projects.

The pandemic has also had an impact on the supply chain of renewable energy equipment, with many manufacturers facing disruptions in their production processes. This has led to delays in the delivery of equipment to projects, which in turn has affected the construction timelines.

The pandemic has also had an impact on the job market in the renewable energy sector. Many companies have had to lay off or reduce their workforce, which has affected the availability of skilled labor.

Despite these challenges, the renewable energy sector has shown resilience, with many companies pivoting to online sales and marketing strategies. This has allowed them to continue to grow their business, even as the pandemic continues to unfold.
