If the coronavirus threat is looming large over the country, all states have not only been preparing to fight against it. They have also been using technology to their advantage. Some states have even used drones to monitor the movement of people. In Maharashtra, for instance, drones with cameras have been used to enforce lockdown rules. They have been flying over deemed ‘vulnerable’ zones to ensure that people are not moving around unnecessarily. The drones have been able to capture images of any violations and share them with local authorities, who can then take appropriate action.

COVID pandemic may take form of suicide pandemic as people face financial strain

With more and more people around the world facing financial difficulties and distressed by the lockdowns imposed in response to the worldwide economic slowdown caused by the COVID-19 outbreak, researchers have found that suicide rates often decrease during times of financial hardship and stress due to the spread of the coronavirus, but this approach may have detrimental secondary effects. While it is important to maintain social connection during the pandemic period, and moderate suicide-related queries during the period of time, but we anticipated a national sense of emotional and psychological strain that might ignite suicidal behavior in the short term, says Elisa Fraidy, data scientist. The proportion of queries related to depression was slightly higher than the previous year.

The findings have been published in the journal Social Science & Medicine. Researchers in the United States and Europe have begun studying the effects of distress related to the COVID-19 pandemic on societal behavior and the mental health of people. The latter is due to the virtual increase in the number of people seeking counseling and therapy.

In the United States, the Framingham Heart Study, one of the nation’s largest long-term health studies, has shown that stressors related to the COVID pandemic can take on new forms, such as financial stress, that were not previously considered.

The study looked at the prevalence of financial stress as a stressor in individuals who sustained financial stress due to the COVID pandemic and found that financial stress was associated with an increased risk of depression. Financial stress has been linked to increased risk of depression in the past. The findings of this study show that financial stress is a concern for individuals who are coping with the COVID pandemic and that it is important to be aware of the potential impact of financial stress on mental health.

The study also highlights the importance of providing support and resources to individuals who are experiencing financial stress. This may include providing financial assistance, counseling, and other forms of support. It is important to continue to monitor the prevalence of financial stress and its impact on mental health as the COVID pandemic continues to evolve.

The armed forces must set the tone for tech-based warfare and create a roadmap so that they can reach ‘Military 4.5’ quickly and guide the industry rather than be dictated by it.

A search for some answers

One wonders if people are suffering more from being infected by Corona or from almost driving themselves over the edge by the fear of the virus.

Dr. Vanshil Gaut

The modern military is increasingly becoming technology-driven, and therefore, industry-driven. The industry, especially the defense, no longer treats war as a fait accompli. Rather, it is a war of five dimensions - digital, psychological, biological, cyber and electronic. The war is fought today not just on the battlefield, but also online, inside the enemy's mind, in the cyber domain and beyond. The modern military is no longer the officer with a sword, but the officer with a laptop, a drone, and a network.

The armed forces must set the tone for tech-based warfare and create a roadmap so that they can reach ‘Military 4.5’ quickly and guide the industry rather than be dictated by it.

While women of Poonch in Jammu have been fighting for their basic right to education, will the New Education Policy be a game changer for them?

Yogesh Garg

Amidst the tale of a young Pakistani educationist who chose to put all the difficulties in various parts of the world, leaving them in a state of despair, the students have ordered complete lockdown, which has trapped them in their homes. The global pandemic has forced the education system to be online, but the students are struggling to keep up with the learning process. The education department has been affected, students learning resulting in a loss of their fundamental process. The only option available to the students and teachers is to switch to online classes. With a massive increase in the number of students, it becomes essential to turn to the stacked syllabus and to keep the students motivated and interested in their learning process.

In the integration of AI and machine learning platforms, students can benefit from the entire learning experience at a faster and more efficient rate. The perfect solution between AI and learning platforms expands the vast era of engagement by making the online session much more meaningful. AI plays a significant role in providing teachers with the necessary tools to track students and keep them engaged. The involvement of machine learning and artificial intelligence has made the process much more personalized by customizing the learning process depending on their skills and capabilities.

Even in times of remote learning, the learning process is difficult in remote areas. The help of artificial intelligence is paramount in this situation. Artificial intelligence (AI) learning platforms can provide an edge in the learning process making these remote regions more accessible and enjoyable for both the teachers as well as the students. The help of artificial intelligence is significant in the learning process.

In the field of basic grading systems, technology can also be of immense help in identifying the knowledge gap so that the students can get a grasp of their mistakes.

The entire process of imparting education, especially for students, has been the backbone of learning. Hence, teachers and students have been the main focus of technology. The students’ performance, sitting of tests and exam papers and tracking the progress of each student is the crux of the entire process. In such a scenario, it becomes essential for the education department to come up with effective strategies for the betterment of the students.

The government has passed the New Education Policy, and the Ministry of Education is working on policies to make education more accessible for all.

Michelle Obama once said, “You’ve got a role to play. That makes you an agent of change. You’ve got the responsibility to choose.[3]” This is not just limited to our personal lives, but as students, we are responsible for our education. From our class notes to the vast knowledge we acquire from our teachers, we are agents of change.

It makes us ponder upon the question: “What does it mean to be a student?”

Being a student means being responsible for our education and our lives. It means being responsible for our own learning and our own success. It means being responsible for our own future.

The New Education Policy aims to make education more accessible for all. It is a step towards reforming the education system and making it more inclusive and equitable. It provides a framework for the education system to move from a rigid and static model to a more flexible and dynamic model.

The policy aims to provide access to education to all, regardless of their background, gender, or socioeconomic status. It also aims to promote innovation and creativity in the classroom and to foster critical thinking and problem-solving skills among students.

The policy also focuses on the development of soft skills, such as communication, collaboration, critical thinking, and creativity. These skills are essential for students to succeed in today’s competitive world.
