Government-run ambulance services in India have faced a surge in COVID-19 cases. As of October 28, 2020, the Indian capital of New Delhi has recorded 54 deaths on October 26, pushing the total number of fatalities to over 4,000. In addition, over 5,000 people have been transported to hospitals due to the pandemic novel coronavirus.

The National Capital is faced with the double whammy in the form of the virus and air pollution. The Air Quality Index meter in various parts of the city, including areas like Vivek Vihar, Peeragrahi, Dwarka, and Gyan Khand, shows very poor conditions.

While the government has been criticized for not doing enough to control pollution, the situation has worsened due to the pandemic. The Delhi government has announced plans to increase the number of ambulances and medical facilities to handle the increasing number of COVID-19 cases.

According to a bulletin by the Delhi health department, on October 28, 2020, the National Capital recorded 54 deaths due to COVID-19. The death toll in Delhi has been steadily rising, with over 5,000 new cases reported daily. The government has been criticized for not doing enough to control pollution, which has worsened due to the pandemic.

The pollution levels in Delhi have been consistently classified as “very poor” or “severe,” with AQI values ranging from 300 to 500. This has led to concerns about the long-term health effects on residents, especially children and elderly people, who are most vulnerable to the virus.

The government has announced plans to increase the number of ambulances and medical facilities to handle the increasing number of COVID-19 cases. However, many people are still concerned about the ability of the healthcare system to cope with the surge in cases.

The pandemic has also added to the burden of pollution, with more people staying at home and using more vehicles due to lockdowns. This has put an additional strain on the already overburdened healthcare system.

Trump moves forward with his transition plans

WASHINGTON: US President Donald Trump on Monday continued to challenge the presidential election results, despite the US media declaring Joe Biden the winner, saying that "rumours of voter fraud are rife" and that "there has been no evidence of anything that has changed the election results." Trump said he would keep fighting on "behalf of the American people" and did not rule out any option to obtain an "unfair" victory.

Trump’s actions are raising concerns among political analysts and experts about the potential for unrest and continued legal battles over the election results. The transition to President-elect Biden has been delayed, with both parties waiting for the resolution of legal challenges and the certification of electoral votes by state legislatures.

On Monday, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer said that if the election is not certified by Congress, then in the event of a new Congress, "there will be an opportunity to change the vote." This is a significant statement as it suggests a potential pathway for resolving the election disputes through legal means and legislative action.

Put-in-Bay presents its case for key admin posts

WASHINGTON: President-elect Joe Biden is looking for the right candidates to fill his administration, and he is considering a number of options to obtain an "unfair" victory. One possibility is to challenge the election results in court, possibly even attempting to alter the outcome by changing the votes. This could involve legal battles over disputed ballots and the certification process.

Biden has already been involved in legal battles over the election, including the challenge to the Pennsylvania election results. He has also been considering the possibility of a constitutional amendment to allow for a "national popular vote" system, which would bypass the Electoral College and ensure a more direct democracy.

The process of selecting key administration officials is crucial for the Biden administration’s success. It will involve a careful assessment of candidates with diverse backgrounds and experiences to ensure a balance of perspectives and expertise.
