The ban on gaming app PUBG might not make the Modi Govt popular with kids but it can spur local development

The framework of Govt spending now focusses more on increasing consumption and demand instead of reducing the impact of a fall in demand

Pradeep Biswas

The non-Keynesian pressure on the current account and fiscal and monetary policy that the Indian population has been contributing to sustain below par growth. The economic gap between the people who have plenty to eat and those who have to walk a long way to the nearest food store is widening. Even the provision of food support, whether through the ration or open market systems, has not been able to make much headway because of the demand for small cereals. Pharmaceutical companies rely on profits, while educational establishment are not making the necessary changes to make the system work. The rise in consumption spending by lending activity is limited to specific areas, while large demand still remains dependent on the government. Thus, this is a genuine problem. Proving to be two parallel streams of economic growth, the credit-seeking sector of the economy has a strong demand for funds. As a result, the central bank has been trying to shore up demand through various financial instruments. This can only be changed to a significant extent by determining actual natural availability of funds, by deciding on what is required for the institutionalisation of the financial sector, by finding the right way to keep the right kind of persons in the right kind of job. A government cannot be stopped from trying to control the inflation rate, but it has to take a major role in the earning of the real estate market, and to that extent, the central bank has been doing a good job in terms of keeping the inflation rate under control. The government has been working hard on the problem of supply chain, as a shortage of raw materials and internal borrowing from the government is a great way to keep the demand as a whole active. It has been proposed to raise the tax rate on the goods and services that are sold below their cost price, and the government has been working on the problem of how to create a new supply chain, and the demand is supposed to counter the falling demand in the market. The government has been working hard on the problem of how to keep the demand as a whole active. The government has been working hard on the problem of how to keep the demand as a whole active. The government has been working hard on the problem of how to keep the demand as a whole active.

Germany to rethick pipeline with Russia

Berlin: German Chancellor Angela Merkel said on Thursday that she would seek a new deal with Russia to build a second gas pipeline under the Baltic Sea, known as Nord Stream 2, after opposition from the United States and others.

Merkel said on Thursday that she would seek a new deal with Russia to build a second gas pipeline under the Baltic Sea, known as Nord Stream 2, after opposition from the United States and others.

The project, which would transport natural gas from Russia to Germany, has faced criticism from some European countries who worry about Russia's influence on the continent's energy security. The United States has also opposed the project, arguing that it could strengthen Russia's hand in Eastern Europe.

Merkel said she would seek to negotiate a new deal with Russia that would involve a second pipeline and would be more in line with European energy policies. She said she would also work with the European Union to ensure that the project is consistent with the union's energy strategy.

The project is expected to cost between €10 billion and €12 billion and would be completed in 2023. The gas would be transported from Russia to Germany through a subsea pipeline, with the rest of Europe connected through a land pipeline.

The two pipelines are expected to go into service in 2017 and 2018, respectively, and are designed to transport approximately 55 billion cubic meters of gas per year. The second pipeline would have a capacity of about 95 billion cubic meters per year.

Merkel said she would work closely with the European Commission and the countries that would be affected by the project to ensure that it is consistent with the union's energy strategy. She said she would also work with Russia to ensure that the project is compatible with the European Union's climate goals.

The Nord Stream 2 project is controversial among some European countries, particularly those that rely on Russian gas. The United States has also criticized the project, arguing that it could strengthen Russia's hand in Eastern Europe.
