The Pegasus Project

A thorough probe into the reported act of snooping is surely needed to clear the air.

Snoop talk is back. Facebook claimed in 2019 that a spyware, Pegasus, developed by Israel-based company NSO Group, was used to target Indian lawmakers, political leaders, and rights activists among them. This Sunday, Pegasus surfaced again, reportedly targeting groups of Indian soldiers, including journalists, rights activists, politicians, and presumably a sitting judge. The government has emphatically denied any role in the affair. The Ministry of Electronics and Information Technology said that the report was not only "baseless but also malicious". A short disruption of the Parliament by the Opposition, Home Minister Amit Shah said the snooping report was by the "enemies" of the country. The latest round came on the eve of the most recent session of Parliament which was even otherwise expected to be stormy for various reasons. The Opposition has held the government responsible for the snooping reports and demanded a probe. A probe is surely needed to clear the air, otherwise allegations of such a nature will do irreparable damage to the democratic process. Only a thorough probe can set at rest all the wild speculations the snoop reports have sowed. As the debate around this issue continues, one could be left wondering if the government has the capacity to develop a national cyber strategy which would meet international standards. This government would need stronger and smarter policy to address such issues.

The Pegasus Project has proposed multidisciplinary and holistic education to ensure unity and integrity of all knowledge, which in itself is a great challenge. The multi-disciplinary and holistic approach to education would give dignity to all and one of the greatest rewards of the last challenge which comes after the childhood education would give dignity to all and one of the greatest rewards of the last challenge which comes after the childhood education, the need for the skills and knowledge which are required to deal with global issues.

The process could be made even more comprehensive if it includes the discipline of languages, discipline of commitment, and cultural education. In current times, social and political aspects of the education are more important than the values and discipline in the education system. This challenge could be reversed.
