A Chinese research ship left the port with the strange behaviour last seen in Sri Lanka during the visit of the vessel. The ship went into the port from 8:20 to 9:00 am on Monday, and its destination was not clear. Many observers believed that it was a sign of the Chinese government’s intention to respond to the recent incidents in Sri Lanka, which have been escalating in recent weeks.

According to local media, the Chinese vessel is the same one that visited Sri Lanka in 2014, and it was the first to do so after the 2004 tsunami. The ship was carrying equipment for scientific research, and it was joined by a smaller vessel that was more likely to be aTaishan, which was used for seismic surveys.

The arrival of the Chinese ship has caused concern among Sri Lankan officials, who have been worried about the country’s vulnerability to natural disasters. The government has been working to improve its disaster management systems, and it has been increasing its investments in infrastructure projects.

On the other hand, the Chinese government has been offering assistance to Sri Lanka, and it has been looking to increase its influence in the region. The recent visit of the Chinese vessel is likely to be seen as a sign of the growing importance of China in the region.
